Leer en español Ler em português We recently spoke to a CEO who felt anxious to speak publicly in the hybrid office. “When I give the presentations now, it’s simple. Everyone is on Zoom,” he said. “What happens when some people come back while others still work from home?” His anxiety makes sense. While Zoom presentations are far from ideal, at least the audience is on an equal playing field. Literally, the boxes on the screen are the same size. Hybrid presentations, on the other hand, run the risk of putting participants away at a serious disadvantage. An important reason has to do with the energy created when we are physically together - and the energy that is missing when we are not. We deduce our energy shared in part by the non-verbal signals that occur when we are together in the room. The conscious looks, facial expressions, personal visual contact are all part of what makes the conversation flow more naturally. This is tangibly absent online, and the lack of energy shared between remote participants can be energizing (so one of the Zoom fatigue factors). Business leaders looking to make hybrid presentations more inclusive, energetic and successful can look at the class for driving. During the first days of pandemic and blockades, we worked with a number of teachers and educators who try to improve their skills and presence of talking on the screen. This academic year, as some children returned to school, we saw some remarkable teachers master the challenge of teaching effectively to hybrid classes. Recently we had the privilege of witnessing one of them in action. This 7th Bethesda teacher was teaching poetry to a hybrid class. We were immediately affected by his energy. His body was constantly moving, and his eyes moved perfectly from the screen to the faces of the room. He also encouraged children to move — asking for raised hands or having remote children standing to read. More importantly, he assigned small working groups where remote children and on screen worked together. Despite being hybrid, class was one. Below are seven strategies for presenters and dating leaders to more effectively involve everyone in their hybrid audience: 1. Focus on positive. Rather than focus on the liabilities of the hybrid encounter, focus on the value each person can bring. Ask yourself how both remote participants and in person can benefit from hearing your presentation. And how could the whole experience be enriched by a hybrid audience? A positive mindset will help you make every person essential for presentation. Besides, that mentality is contagious. The presenter sets the tone for the entire experience. Ifbelieves and expresses enthusiasm about the hybrid experience, this will positively influence the experience of the public. 2. It requires cameras to be in operation. In hybrid meetings, it is more important than ever that remote participants turn their ownto show their full presence. It is also essential that the presenter be able to interact visually with the entire audience, not only with those of the room. To further level the game field, consider asking in-person participants to bring their laptops and turn on their cameras, keeping silent when not talking. It can also be useful to have a screen in front of the room so that remote participants can be seen by everyone. 3. Make direct eye contact. Start the presentation at first by deliberately looking directly at the camera. This sends the whole group a message that people in Zoom are critical. Try to focus on the camera as if you were making contact with a person. Then throughout the presentation, continue to switch between looking at the individuals in the room to return the fire to the camera. 4. Move to include everyone. When the presentation begins, move towards the camera to help remote participants feel connected to what is happening in the room. Keep talking, move towards people in the room and then back to the camera. But make sure you keep the camera frame in mind. You don't want to venture too far from the blow. This back-and-forth movement communicates more inclusive and makes participants both inside and outside the room feel more connected. Also consider lighting. If someone in the room is talking, lift the camera (laptop) and move it closer to the speaker (if they did not bring their own). This reminds people in the room that their remote colleagues are part of the room. 5. Emotively involve distance participants. The hybrid model must not be a passive experience for those who are composing. It is essential to help them feel heard and seen. Greeting virtual participants personally at the beginning of the session. And continue to face them and involve them during the presentation. This is easier said than done. Presenters can have the best of intentions, but their attention is naturally drawn to people in the room. Design specific times in the presentation to speak directly to remote participants, and build in content messages that are specifically directed towards individuals to compose. 6. Foster hybrid collaboration. When you divide a larger presentation into smaller groups, the temptation is to put the person and remote people into separate groups. This strengthens the notion that the two are separate groups rather than a group working together. Instead, try to mix it. Have virtual participants and in-person work together. 7. Keep it short. Zoom forced us to waste less time in the presentations. When we get back to the room, we can resisttemptation to speak longer. Keep hybrid presentations as short and efficient as possible. Try to delay the meeting based on the energy levels of the remote participants. In the end, everyone will appreciate it. One of the potential benefits of hybrid hybrid is that everyone participates from their favorite position. The 7th degree teacher told us that this created a greater equity in his class and that his class was enriched by each student learning from their peak performance site. This mentality is inspiring — both for its students and business leaders. As we move into this next era of hybrid presentations, we follow his example and we strive to create an inclusive and energetic environment for each person in the audience. The easiest way to fix two pieces of wood together is with nails. They are produced in a variety of shapes, sizes and metals to complete almost any fastening work. Most commonly, nails are made of steel, but other types - aluminum, brass, nickel, bronze, copper and stainless steel -- are available for use where corrosion could occur. In addition, the nails are produced with coatings - galvanized, blue or cemented -- to prevent rust and increase their sealing power. Nail cut is designated by penny size, originally price per cent nails. Penny's size, almost always referred to as "d", varies from 2 pennies, or 2d (1 inch long), to 60 pennies, or 60d (6 inches long). Shorter nails of 1 inch are called brades; 6 inch longer nails are called tips. The length of the nail is important, because at least two thirds of the nail must be guided in the base, or more often, material. For example, a 1 X 3 nailed to a 4 X 4 beam should be fixed with an 8 penny, or 8d, nail. An 8d nail is 2 1/2 inches long. 3/4 inches of its length will pass through the 1 X 3, and the remaining 1 3/4 inches will go into the beam. Nails are usually sold by the pound; smaller the nail, more nails to the pound. You can buy nail mass from a nail; nails are weighed and then evaluated by the dealer. Or you can buy packed nails, sold in boxes ranging from 1 pound to 50 pounds. For most repairs, some boxes from 1 pounds of popular nail size will last a long time. What follows are some of the most common nail types. Common nails: Used for most medium-heavy construction work, this type of nail has a thick head and can be pushed into difficult materials. Common nails are made from thread and cut to the correct length and are available in size 2d through 60d. Box Nails: Lighter and smaller in diameter than common nails, the nails of the box are designed for light construction and home use. Finish Nails: Finishing nails are clearer than ordinary nails and have a small head. They are often used for installing panels and finishes where you do not want the nail head to show. Cover nails: Usuallycover nails have a much bigger head than ordinary nails. This helps prevent asphalt shingles damage. Dry wall nails: Nails made for the installation of plasterboard are often rings and have an indented head. The anular-ring nails have sharp ridges along the nail shaft, providing greater sealing power. Resonance Nails: There are three types of masonry nails designed for use withand concrete block: round, square and flute. The masonry nails should not be used where high resistance is required. The fixing of brick, stone, or reinforced concrete must be made with screws or bolts in lag. Heels: Available in round and cutting shapes, the heels are used to hold carpet or wood fabric. Padded heels have decorative heads. Undulating closure: Corrugated nails, also called cowardly nails, are used for light joints-where strength is not important. The fixing elements are fixed at the right angle at the joint. Home Repair tools: If you prefer to use the Yellow Pages for anything you need to fix around the house or consider yourself a normal do-it-yourselfer, there are a handful of tools that everyone should have in their instrument box. Find out all about them in this article. Fasteners: Fixing, like nails and screws, are used to connect two things together. Discover the types of fasteners available and what are typically used for this page. Hammer: A hammer could be the most common home repair tool around, also used the least useful of people for simple projects like hanging a picture on a wall. More information about the types of hammers available on this page. page.
